SYNOPSIS

De negenjarige Benni hunkert naar een warm en permanent thuis, maar door een jeugdtrauma is ze onhandelbaar. Haar laatste hoop is de jonge anti-agressiecoach Micha, die iets van zichzelf in het meisje herkent. Maar er zijn grenzen aan de hulp die hij haar kan bieden.

System Crasher is een indringend en confronterend drama dat aantoont dat de huidige jeugdzorg tekortschiet in de opvang van complexe gevallen. Een actueel thema waar de politiek vooralsnog geen oplossing voor biedt.

System Crasher is de Duitse Oscarinzending en won meerdere prijzen waaronder een Zilveren Beer op het Filmfestival van Berlijn.

UITGEBREIDE SYNOPSIS

Door een jeugdtrauma worstelt de negenjarige Benni (Helena Zengel) met paniekaanvallen en onvoorspelbaar, vaak buitenissig agressief gedrag. Haar alleenstaande moeder Bianca (Lisa Hagmeister) kan de zorg voor haar niet aan, waardoor de sociale dienst zich over het meisje ontfermt. Ze houdt het in geen enkel pleeggezin lang vol, ondanks de vele inspanningen van de wanhopige maatschappelijk werkster mevrouw Bafané (Gabriela Maria Schmeide). Haar laatste hoop is Micha (Albrecht Schuch), een jonge anti-agressiecoach wiens taak het wordt om Benni naar school te begeleiden. Als er een goede band tussen hen lijkt te ontstaan en het zoveelste incident in een instelling zich voordoet, stelt Micha voor om samen met Benni een paar weken in het bos door te brengen.

Dat verblijf vergt veel van Micha, maar hij slaagt erin om voor Benni een omgeving te creëren waarin hij haar kan bereiken en tot bedaren kan brengen. Maar bij terugkeer zijn de zaken niet meer zo eenvoudig. Benni geef te kennen bij Micha te willen wonen; de jongerenwerker realiseert zich dat hij zijn professionele afstand aan het verliezen is. Als dan ook nog Benni's moeder opduikt ontstaat er een onhoudbare situatie.

While shooting a documentary about a home for dispossessed women, I heard the unofficial term "system crasher" for the first time, because the youngest resident was just I4 years old. There were no children's homes left willing to take the girl in. I couldn't get that term out of my head, so I started an intense research. During this period I met an II-year-old boy who had been in 52 different institutions. "System crashers" are children with incredible strength and endurance, but still tragic figures. At a very early age they put all their opportunities of becoming integrated into our society at risk. How much energy does it take to drive so many trained child care workers to despair? What if it were possible to re-channel this energy and use it for positive purposes?

My motivation for making this film was to sensitize people to children like Benni. That's why the film is being told primarily from Benni's point of view. As spectators we develop a feeling for the confusing number of "homes", the changing guardians and the constant and dizzying disruption of relationships. At the same time, Benni draws us into the wild, uncertain, fantasy-filled world of a child fighting for her own sense of being. I wanted the film to bubble with energy and, despite the tragic nature of the topic, to be humorous and lighthearted. Just like Benni is. Although we may be upset – even shocked – by Benni's violent behavior, we should learn to love her and to fear for her during the course of the film. Ever since I met my first "system crasher", I've known that I had to tell a story about one. Children's violence is a cry for help. Always.

PRODUCERS' NOTE | PETER HARTWIG, JONAS WEYDEMANN, FRAUKE KOLBMÜLLER

Every good movie needs a good script. Naturally! Through her years of research and great empathy, Nora Fingscheidt has written a book that convinced all of us immediately. Completely! While reading the script, we were already plunged into emotional depths, were engaged boldly, cheerfully, and with positivity and then confronted with the harsh reality. The story of Benni and her desperate struggle for her mother's love coincides in many ways with our view of the way a narrative should be. Taking the child's perspective, not judging anyone as guilty, but questioning all sides, shedding light on their despair and often helplessness – this is something that greatly appeals to us.

During filming this was a great challenge for everyone involved – to take the child's perspective, to always remain at eye level, to allow space for the child's spontaneous reactions and to follow them. The sets were set up at 360° , which, for a debut film with a limited budget, means finding creative solutions really everywhere at all levels. For example, the production office was converted into one of the sets, and so we worked on the staircase with laptops on our knees. Everyone in the team took on several tasks. And so did we as producers, each with a stronger focus in the different project phases and always in constant and very close collaboration with Nora. Her vision formed the center of our actions.

Nora succeeded in translating Benni's adventurous journey into a highly emotional drama. The film's many contrasts and nuances, what we were aspiring to cinematographically, combined with an emotional roller coaster – the audience is sure to laugh and cry. We want to stimulate a discussion about the place of children in our society – for such a discussion to occur in the first place, and much more. And also a discussion about the responsibility that many people take on in this area.

Nora Fingscheidt | Director

Nora Fingscheidt was born in Braunschweig in 1983 and spent her childhood in Germany and Argentina. From 2003 onwards she supported the development of the self-organized film school filmArche in Berlin. At the same time, she completed her training as an acting coach by Sigrid Andersson. 2008 – 2017 Nora studied fiction directing at the Film Academy Baden-Württemberg. Her graduation film, the full-length documentary WITHOUT THIS WORLD about a conservative Mennonite colony in Argentina, won the Max Ophüls Prize and First Steps Award in 2017. Her fiction debut SYSTEM CRASHER has already won several awards at script level. It also won the "Works in Progress" section at Les Arcs Film Festival.

PETER HARTWIG | KINEO FILMPRODUKTION

Peter Hartwig was born in 1964 in Babelsberg. Since completing his studies at the Film University Babelsberg KONRAD WOLF, he has been involved in over 59 films in various capacities. He has participated in all of Andreas Dresen's major films since 1993 – in addition to works by Oskar Roehler, Esther Gronenborn, Dani Levy, Philipp Stölzl, Andreas Kleinert, Urs Egger, Volker Schlöndorff, and other directors. With his kineo label, he has produced films that have received the Grimme Award, among other prizes, and has twice been awarded the title of Fairest Producer at the Berlinale.

Peter Hartwig also works as a photographer and is frequently involved in special projects in this context – most recently 3 DAYS IN QUIBERON and GUNDERMANN. SYSTEM CRASHER is already his second collaboration with Nora Fingscheidt.

Benni, the heroine of SYSTEM CRASHER, is nine years old. What was your experience like as a nine-year-old?

Quite good, actually. I was also a rebellious child, but lucky enough to grow up in a family environment that was able to accept and channel my energy.

Benni doesn't benefit from this good fortune. As a so-called "problem child," she has to constantly change caregivers and deal with the decisions that others make for her. Did this subject come to you, or did you search for it?

It came to me, yes, you can say that. For a long time I wanted to make a story about a volatile and extremely energetic girl. The idea wouldn't let go of me, but I simply didn't have the right occasion yet to implement it. When I was making a documentary about a homeless women's shelter in Stuttgart six years ago, that moment had come.

Please describe this moment.

One day a fourteen-year-old girl moved into the shelter. This was a shock for me. I asked about her and heard the term "system crasher" for the first time. This is what children like Benni, who are kicked out everywhere they go, are unofficially called.

SYSTEM CRASHER is a fascinating expression...

Yes, incredibly powerful and radical. But I'm aware that it will be polarizing as a film title. Because it's not about hackers or anti-G20 protesters. Even among experts it is very controversial, because it doesn't capture the heart of the matter. These children and adolescents aren't destroying any kind of functioning system; rather, it is failed system processes that lead to the fact that they aren't accepted anywhere and are repeatedly thrown off track. So one tries to avoid "system crasher" as a term. Nevertheless, there are few really good alternatives.

Why is Benni only nine?

It was a deliberate decision, just like the decision to cast a girl and not a boy, who are in the majority as "system crashers." At the age of nine, children can act consciously to a certain extent, and also manipulate. Nonetheless, we should be afraid for Benni. We wanted to keep her away from clichés and rash categorizations, like suggesting adolescent rebellion simply because she may be fourteen years old. Also, Benni shouldn't live in a rough big city, in order to avoid putting her into the next pigeonhole and thereby simplifying the subject matter.

This is a character that stands or falls with her actress. How did you find the fascinating Helena Zengel?

For years while I was writing the script, I thought I would never find a girl who could play Benni. And if I did, the parents would never agree to let her play this girl. Nevertheless, I kept writing because I had to do it. Of course I made a point of starting the search early enough — in agencies, on the streets, in schools and sports clubs. Helena was the seventh in the first se-lection of ten girls. It was immediately clear that she had something extremely special. But I thought it was impossible that we had already found the right one in number seven. The Dardenne brothers cast 700 boys for The Kid with a Bike! So we moved on, auditioned around 150 girls and still kept coming back to Helena again and again.

What was special about her?

She was the only one who could play aggression and hardship at the same time. There was never anything spoiled or impudent, it was always linked with fragility and vulnerability.

How did you work with Helena?

At first Helena's mother read the script with her alone. She has a great understanding of our narrative concerns, but asked immediately how we would deal with the extremes in terms of content. I am the mother of an eight-year-old son myself, which is why it was particularly important to me to go about our preparations very carefully. The goal was to slip into the character of Benni and enter into her world little by little. We started to get to know each other and work together six months before shooting. This also meant that Helena was involved in the process of selecting the actors, down to the smallest supporting role. So everyone had to meet and interact with her during auditions. And she really has an enormous presence, so you have to hold your own as a partner on the set.

How did you rehearse with Helena?

On the day before the actual shooting day we rehearsed the material, explored texts and situations, also in order to see what might not be right. Then we slept on it. So we always knew what to expect.

The focus of SYSTEM CRASHER is clearly on Benni. Nevertheless, the successful balance is up to the adults who interact or try to interact with her.

Because the whole system consists of people who are caught up in structures that for the most part they did not create themselves.

Do you also want to provoke a discussion in society?

Yes, a discussion about violence and aggression, which often arise out of fear, especially among children, and how we deal with it. About what lies behind the understandable impulse to want to lock away these children, because others have to be protected. Who among us is aware that there are still children's homes and child psychiatry offices that are overflowing everywhere and have long waiting lists? In Germany this is more of a marginal social issue. But also thinking about all the caregivers who are often extremely overburdened in their strenuous and under-appreciated jobs.

On the subject of research, it must have been prolonged and intense.

It certainly was! It went on for several years. I lived in a residential group and worked in a school for educational assistance, a child welfare placement center, and a child psychiatry office. In addition, I held countless discussions with employees of institutions and agencies and also with child and youth psychologists. It was a kaleidoscope of people and places that moved me very much.

Did you ever have the feeling that there was still a missing piece of the puzzle, so there was a danger of the research never ending?

I had to stop the research for other reasons, because at a certain point, what I saw and heard was affecting me too much. My world view had grown too much darker. All the severe cases of child abuse and neglect accumulated. I couldn't have endured any more research.

Are children like Benni lost?

I think it is very difficult for them, but they are often so impressive and yet invisible at the same time. This only changes when they are maybe sixteen or eighteen and situations start to escalate. The really terrible stories these teenagers went through as children, when they were really in need, remain in the shadows. But there are also occasional cases where children pull themselves together.

You also work as a documentary filmmaker. Why did SYSTEM CRASHER become a feature film?

A documentary was something I never considered as an option. I wanted to create an intense, energetic audiovisual cinematic experience that lays no claim to reality. Because the reality is much worse. WITHOUT THIS WORLD, however, my last project, could never have become a feature film. I would never have wanted to stage a fundamentalist Christian sect with German roots in Argentina. I wanted to really go there, to feel and experience, to observe. For SYSTEM CRASHER, though, I couldn't intrude into the lives of real people who already have it hard enough. Absolutely not!

It would be too harsh for audiences, too.

Barely endurable even. Who would want to watch that? I wanted to make an intense fictional film with a raw energy that rivets the audience and shakes them up in a positive sense. It's also about the beauty of people who simply don't fit into the system.

The scenes that Benni's mother gets are few, but intense and painful. Were they especially tricky to pull off?

They were like treading a borderline. Because we're presenting a mother who loves her child yet harms her at the same time, who is helpless and overwhelmed, gentle, weak, and at the same time tough and severe. I often experienced something like this during my research: mothers with five children who have been taken from them, and yet they go on to have a sixth, seventh, eighth. You have to look very closely at these women to understand what is behind their decisions. It's about not betraying them, but letting them keep their dignity. As a child you are at the mercy of your parents, regardless of which family you are born into. Nearly all children like Benni want to go back to mom and dad, even if they experienced abuse and egregious violence there. This often renders us adults speechless, but it's a fact.

Though a few devices are used, SYSTEM CRASHER is carried by its own authentic atmosphere.

The film contains many generalized scenes that reflect reality. Scenes that were told to me or that I experienced and then developed further. They were to some extent polished, shortened, or amplified, simply due to the needs of the film dramaturgy and the fact that it must remain watchable. And yet I was primarily concerned with conveying Benni's emotional world, her traumas, and her body feeling. SYSTEM CRASHER stands for what I want in cinema. I like antiheroes who do terrible things out of desperation and hurt the people they love the most.
