NEON BULL – synopsis nl/fr

Iremar werkt in de traditionele rodeo stallen in het Noordoosten van Brazilië waar hij samen met een cowboy te paard een grote stier bij zijn staart probeert te vangen. Maar achter deze stoere werkzaamheden van Iremar schuilt een man die een rustig en eenzaam leven leidt. Terwijl hij met de stieren van stad naar stad reist, droomt hij ervan kledingontwerper te worden. In een unieke mix van sociaal realisme, impressionistische beelden en zinderende erotiek geeft Neon Bull een vernieuwende blik op het machismo van Latijns Amerika.

NEON BULL ging in wereldpremière op het Filmfestival van Venetië in 2015 en won daar de Venice Horizons Award - Special Jury Prize.

duur 1u41 – taal Portugees

Le vaquerada est un rodéo traditionnel typique de la région du nord-est du Brésil, où deux hommes à cheval tentent de mettre un taureau à terre en l'attrapant par la queue. Un univers poussiéreux. Un travail très physique confié à Iremar, lequel est chargé de préparer les bêtes au rodéo. C'est dans le camion qui transporte les taureaux qu'Iremar a élu domicile. Il le partage avec Galega, danseuse et mère d'une fillette pleine de vie, et avec Zé, qui s'occupe aussi des bêtes avec lui. Ils forment ensemble une vraie famille de substitution. Alors que l'industrie du textile est en pleine expansion dans cette région du Brésil, Iremar se prend à rêver à la nouvelle vie qui pourrait être la sienne. Allongé dans son hamac à l'arrière du camion, il s'imagine au milieu des étoffes et des paillettes, coupant et assemblant ses dernières créations et les derniers modèles à la mode.

NEON BULL – director's statement

Amidst a recent wave of rapid economic growth, the film is an attempt to renovate the political and symbolic understanding of contemporary human relations in the Northeast of Brazil, where I grew up and have always lived. The Vaquejada rodeo – one of the largest agro-business events in Brazil - seems to provide a fitting allegory of the recent transformations affecting the region.

Through the lives of characters trying to keep pace with a new scale of desires and aspirations, I want to explore colors and textures that demonstrate the contradictions of consumption and expanding notions of identity and gender. I hope that by embracing the lives of this group of Vaqueiros, the cowhands who live on the road transporting bulls between Vaquejadas and working backstage at the event, NEON BULL throws new light on recent socio-economic and cultural changes.

The film is a study of the body, light and the transformation of the human landscape.

NEON BULL – Q&A with the director

Q - How did the idea to make a film about a cowhand who wants to work in fashion come about?

The film takes place in a region where livestock and agricultural activities share space with a rapidly growing textile and clothing industry. During my research for the script I came into contact with the world of the Vaqueiros (cowhands) who work backstage at the Vaquejada and I met one particular cowhand who worked with both livestock and textiles. I was fascinated by the way he ritualized the cleaning of the bulls tails and then, a few hours later, would be sitting at a sewing machine for his second shift. This was the starting point for creating a fictional character who accumulates roles that combine force and delicacy, bravura and sensitivity, violence and endearment.

What was the biggest challenge in making this film?

The scenes were all quite long and therefore complex to shoot, and we had the added complication of bulls and horses in many of the sequences, yet much of the magic of the film occurs exactly when the animals take centre stage. One of the central themes of the film was to question ideas of body hierarchy, be it animal or human, male or female. During the research for the script, spending time at the Vaquejadas, I noticed a fascinating ethic of the body that distinguished the way landowners and labourers related to each other and to the animals. Behind the stage the cowhands clean the tail of the bull, dust it with chalk and release them onto the track. Two horsemen then chase after the bull. The farmhand, mounted on one horse, grabs the bull's tail and passes it over to the second rider, who is also the owner of the horses, and whose job it is to finish the task of pulling the bull to the ground, taking the glory of the fall. I realized that this "sport" is almost an allegory of Brazilian hierarchy, materializing itself in the bodies of these men and animals. The repetition of this same movement for hours and hours it became almost a ritual, a recurring choreography. So I wanted to explore the presence of these human and animal bodies politically, revealing new contours, new impressions, new eruptions, showing that violence and pleasure inhabit the same body.

It is the first time that you are working with experienced actors in Brazil. What was the process of preparing them for the film?

I come from a documentary and visual arts background, so, working with really experienced actors was a new and very rewarding challenge. I was supported by Fatima Toledo as drama coach (City of God, Elite Force, Suely in the Sky, A Jaula de Oro) and she conducted a wonderful rehearsal and preparation process. The length of the scenes was a real challenge and we had to work meticulously to choreograph them, but at the same time, give them room to breathe.

The film takes place in the same region where many classics of the Brazilian New Cinema movement were filmed in the 60s and 70s. Why did you choose to film in this region?

In the 60s politicians and economists viewed the northeast of Brazil as the problem region due to its history of desertification, starvation, drought, religious fanaticism and popular revolt. At the same time cinema and literature found an allegory of the class fight and rural uprisings in the region. Cinema Novo embraced the northeast as a terrain that crystalized certain symbols and ideas that they propagated, such as the preservation of traditional culture, the bravery and puritanism of the rural worker and the existence of values that could alleviate the identity crisis of urban centres. Today the context in Brazil is very different. The region has gone through a process of rapid economic development and its peri-urban towns are very wealthy, although inequality is still rampant and the landscape is testament to chaotic construction and lack of long-term development strategies. The film aims to uncover a new contemporary rural reality with symbols that are different from those of Cinema Novo in the way they relate to human emotion and aspiration. It is a film about the transformation of the human landscape.

How did you develop a visual concept for NEON BULL?

The idea was to break with a monochromatic image of desertification in the region that is present in many historic films of the Northeast. We filmed during the rainy season, so everything is quite green and we included many multi-coloured elements. The existence of colour acts as a political agent that transmits a certain idea of modernity and economic progress. The cinematography of the film was an integral part of the choreography of each and every scene of the film. The camera makes very subtle, constant movements, edging into new spaces, mapping the human fabric that emanates from this complex, often turbulent landscape, that is both ordinary and surreal.

Your characters don't conform to stereotypical depictions of male and female roles, in Brazil or elsewhere...

What interests me is the expansion of gender representation, and by depicting the routine of the day-to-day, I try to ensure that any reshaping of gender roles is not sensationalized, but rather, normalized. I also wanted to go beyond the psychology of the characters, rooting the film in the physical presence of the characters in their natural surroundings and the daily choreography that has the potential to be a catalysing, poetic experience. The film doesn't necessarily follow one particular protagonist, rather it speculates on the impact of the performative experiences of each character within the group. It is about curious characters and intense experiences, and despite knowing little about who these people are, we find ourselves becoming deeply involved with their stories during the film.

NEON BULL focuses on the microscopic conflicts that make up the everyday. As with all routines, life is cyclical, continues and then the film ends.

NEON BULL –Gabriel Mascaro

Gabriel Mascaro (1983) is een filmmaker en visual artist afkomstig van Recife, Brazilië. Zijn eerste langspeelfilm, VENTOS DE AGOSTO (AUGUST WINDS), ging in première in de competitie van het Locarno Filmfestival van 2014 en kreeg er een Speciale Vermelding toegekend. De film won nog verschillende andere prijzen en werd ook door de pers op veel lof onthaald. Zijn eerdere documentaires en video-installaties werden op verschillende belangrijke filmfestivals en kunsthappenings gertoond waaronder in Rotterdam (IFFR), Amsterdam (IDFA), Oberhausen, Clermont Ferrand, Leipzig, BFI London, the Guggenheim, Barcelona Museum of Contemporary Art, MoMA Documentary Fortnight, en tijdens de São Paulo Biennale.

BOI NEON (NEON BULL) is zijn tweede langspeelfilm.

L'artiste et réalisateur Gabriel Moscaro est né en 1983 à Recife (Brésil) où il vit et travaille. A mi-chemin entre cinéma et arts visuels, son travail a été présenté non seulement dans de nombreux musées et évènements majeurs d'art contemporain mais également dans de multiples festivals de cinéma. Gabriel Mascaro a participé au programme résidence d'artiste Vidéobrasil / Vidéoformes à Clermont Ferrand et a été accueilli dans une résidence au Wexner Center for the Arts dans l'Ohio, USA. « Neon Bull » est son deuxième long metrage.
